Theorizing the Role of Affect in Society and Culture

Fall 2023

Thursday 1:45–4:45 p.m.

Museum 328

Instructor: Greg Urban (he, him, his)

COURSE DESCRIPTION

Affect has held a prominent place in social theory, including the role of fear in Hobbes's formulation of the origins of civil society, respect (for the sacred) in Durkheim's theory of religion, guilt in Freud's understanding of civilization, and hate (and self-hate) in Fanon's analysis of race relations. Can such formulations be brought into conversation with the biological understandings of human beings from Darwin up to recent developments in affective neuroscience? What light has psychoanalysis shed on these issues? This reading-and-discussion-based seminar focuses on such questions. We explore the terrain of social, cultural, and psychoanalytic theory in light of conceptualizations growing out of the biological side of anthropology, and we look at the biological side of anthropology from the perspective of sociocultural and psychoanalytic theory. We trace social and cultural theorization through twentieth century developments, as well as exploring twenty-first century developments in affect theory within anthropology and adjacent disciplines, including works by Judith Butler and Kathleen Stewart.

REQUIREMENTS

During the course of the semester, students will write short reading responses, and lead class discussions. They will also work on and submit a final term paper (2,500-3,000 words) in which they explore additional literature on or go more deeply into one of the weekly themes from the semester, or on a topic they themselves propose that is approved by the course instructor.

BOOKS

The principal books for the class are the following.

Darwin, Charles. 1896. Expression of Emotions in Man and Animals. New York: D. Appleton and Company. [Available online through Penn library]

Elliott, Anthony. 2002. Psychoanalytic Theory: An Introduction. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Panksepp, Jaak and Lucy Biven 2012. The Archaeology of Mind: Neuroevolutionary Origins of Human Emotions. [This is NOT currently available online through the library; I am working on this with the library, but I'm not holding my breath].

SCHEDULE

Week 1

Thursday, August 29, 2023

General discussion of the relationship between biological processes (with a focus on neuroscience, especially the role of affect) and sociocultural processes (with a focus on what individuals acquire by interacting with other individuals, such as ways of cognizing or understanding the world, including beliefs, ways of acting or behaving, and ways of valuing, as well as the principal means of communication (language)). The nature of coercion.
